87-368

No. - .

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
SEP 1 1987
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1987

BANK OF NEW ENGLAND, N.A.,

Petitioner,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Respondent.

ON PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIRST CIRCUIT.

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

LAURENCE H. TRIBE
Counsel of Record
SUSAN ESTRICH
KATHLEEN M. SULLIVAN
1525 Massachusetts Avenue
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138
(617) 495-4621
Attorneys for Petitioner

Of Counsel:
MARK A. MICHELSON
AMOS HUGH SCOTT
CHOATE, HALL & STEWART
Exchange Place
53 State Street
Boston, Massachusetts 02109
(617) 227-5020

August 31, 1987

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether a corporation may be convicted of a felony as to which Congress required specific intent, even if none of its employees ever knowingly or intentionally violated the law.

2. Whether a statute by which Congress provided felony liability only for "[a] person violating" the law "as part of a pattern" of violations authorizes a separate felony conviction for each violation that is part of such a pattern, an issue as to which the circuits are divided.

RULE 28.1 STATEMENT

Petitioner Bank of New England, N.A., is owned by the BNE Massachusetts Corporation, which in turn is owned by the Bank of New England Corporation, a publicly traded company.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	PAGE
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	i
RULE 28.1 STATEMENT	ii
TABLE OF CONTENTS	iii
TABLE OF AUTHORITIES	iv
OPINIONS BELOW	1
JURISDICTION	2
CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED	2
STATEMENT OF THE CASE	3
REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT	6
I. WHETHER A CORPORATION MAY BE CONVICTED OF A SPECIFIC INTENT CRIME ON THE BASIS OF "ORGANIZATIONAL INDIFFERENCE" IS AN IMPORTANT QUESTION OF FEDERAL LAW	7
II. WHETHER A "PATTERN" OF CURRENCY TRANSACTION REPORTING VIOLATIONS GIVES RISE TO A SINGLE FELONY, OR INSTEAD TO A SEPARATE FELONY FOR EVERY VIOLATION THAT IS PART OF THE PATTERN, IS AN IMPORTANT QUESTION OF FEDERAL LAW THAT HAS DIVIDED THE CIRCUITS	12
CONCLUSION	17

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

PAGE

Cases:

Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81 (1955) 16

Ladner v. United States, 358 U.S. 169 (1958) 16

Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939) 16

McNally v. United States, 107 S.Ct. 2875 (1987) ... 7

Riss & Co., Inc. v. United States, 262 F.2d 245 (8th Cir. 1958) 10n

Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Thurston, 469 U.S. 111 (1985) 10n

United States v. Beusch, 596 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1979) . 13, 15

United States v. Bishop, 412 U.S. 346 (1973) 10, 11

United States v. Boston & Me. R.R., 380 U.S. 157 (1965) 7

United States v. Chen, 605 F.2d 433 (9th Cir. 1979) . 8n

United States v. Dichne, 612 F.2d 632 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 928 (1980) 8n

United States v. Dickinson, 706 F.2d 88 (2d Cir. 1983) . 15

United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540 (11th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S.Ct. 791 (1985) 8n

United States v. Granda, 565 F.2d 922 (5th Cir. 1978) . 8n, 11

United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 32 (1812) 7

United States v. Illinois Central Ry. Co., 303 U.S. 239 (1938) 9, 10

United States v. Kattan-Kassin, 696 F.2d 893 (11th Cir. 1983) 13, 14, 15

United States v. Murdock, 290 U.S. 389 (1933) 10

PAGE

United States v. Pomponio, 429 U.S. 10 (1976) 11

United States v. Sans, 731 F.2d 1521 (11th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S.Ct. 791 (1985) 8n

United States v. Sawyer Transport, Inc., 337 F. Supp. 29 (D. Minn. 1971), aff'd, 463 F.2d 175 (8th Cir. 1972) 10n

United States v. Schnaiderman, 568 F.2d 1208 (5th Cir. 1978) 8n

United States v. So, 755 F.2d 1350 (9th Cir. 1985) . 14, 15

United States v. T.I.M.E.-D.C., Inc., 381 F. Supp. 730 (W.D. Va. 1974) 10n

United States v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 344 U.S. 218 (1952) 16

United States v. Warren, 612 F.2d 887 (5th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 956 (1980) 8

United States v. Wiltberger, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 76 (1820) 7

Constitutional Provisions:

United States Constitution
Amendment V 2

Statutes:

28 U.S.C. § 1254(1) 2

31 U.S.C. § 1059(2) 13n
5313(a) 2
5322 7
5322(a) 3n, 4n, 12, 13
5322(b) 3, 4n, 12, 13

PAGE

Rules and Regulations:

31 C.F.R. § 103.22(a)(2) (1985) 3n, 4n

52 Fed. Reg. 11436 (April 8, 1987) 4n, 5n

Miscellaneous:

Comptroller General, Report to Congress, "Bank Secrecy Act Reporting Requirements Have Not Yet Met Expectations, Suggesting Need For Amendment," GGD-81-80 (1981) 4n

H.R. Rep. No. 975, 91st Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in 1970 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 4394 14

No. - .

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1987

BANK OF NEW ENGLAND, N.A.,

Petitioner,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Respondent.

ON PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIRST CIRCUIT.

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit has not yet been reported, and is attached as Appendix A to this Petition.[1] The underlying judgment of [1] Citations to the appendix to this Petition will be denoted "A. ___." Citations to the record as reprinted in the appendix submitted to the court of appeals will be denoted 1st Cir. App. ___.

conviction in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts (Zobel, J.), entered upon jury verdict, is unreported. The memorandum decision denying petitioner's motions to dismiss is reported at 640 F. Supp. 36 (D. Mass. 1986).

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit was entered on June 10, 1987. See Appendix B. Rehearing was denied on July 6, 1987. See Appendix C. On July 17, 1987, Associate Justice Byron R. White ordered the mandate of the Court of Appeals recalled and stayed pending the filing and disposition of this petition for certiorari. This Court's jurisdiction is invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The United States Constitution, Amendment V, provides in relevant part that:

> No person . . . shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law . . .

The Bank Secrecy Act, 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a), provides:

> When a domestic financial institution is involved in a transaction for the payment, receipt, or transfer of United States coins or currency . . . in an amount, denomination, or amount and denomination, or under circumstances the Secretary prescribes by regulation, the institution and any other participant in the transaction the Secretary may prescribe shall file a report on the transaction at the time and in the way the Secretary prescribes.

Felony liability is imposed under 31 U.S.C. § 5322(b):

> A person willfully violating this subchapter or a regulation prescribed under this subchapter . . . as part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period, shall be fined not more than $500,000, imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.[2]

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This is a case about the limits of judicial power to expand the reach of the federal criminal law beyond the bounds Congress has set. Two issues are presented. The first is whether the courts are free to treat a corporation's inaction as equivalent to the "willfulness" required by Congress. The second is whether the courts are free to construe an undeniably ambiguous felony enhancement provision so as to choose the most punitive possible interpretation from among several admittedly plausible alternatives.

This case arose under the Bank Secrecy Act and its implementing regulations. Those regulations require banks to file reports of currency transactions of more than $10,000.[3] At the time covered by the indictment, willful violations of those regulations were misdemeanors, and only a pattern of such misdemeanors triggered felony liability.[4] Petitioner, the Bank

---

[2] The statute has since been amended to extend the maximum prison term under this provision to ten years, an amendment not relevant here.

[3] During the period covered by the indictment, financial institutions were required to file a report "of each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment or transfer . . . which involves a transaction in currency of more than $10,000." 31 C.F.R. § 103.22(a)(1) (1985).

[4] During the period covered by the indictment, 31 U.S.C. § 5322(a) provided that "[a] person willfully violating" the reporting regulation "shall be fined not of New England ("the Bank"), was charged and convicted of 31 separate felonies, and fined a total of $1.24 million, because it failed to report a series of cash withdrawals by a customer at one branch, James McDonough.

At the time these withdrawals were made, it was far from clear that they were reportable as a matter of law. While there is no dispute that, on 31 occasions, Mr. McDonough withdrew more than $10,000 in currency from the Bank, he did so on each occasion by using a series of counter checks, each for less than $10,000. See 1st Cir. App. 2129-48. The federal government itself was deeply divided at the time about whether transactions so structured were reportable.[5] Indeed, it was not until this year — well after the trial and conviction in this case — that the Treasury Department finally amended the regulations to require reports of such multiple transactions.[6] more than $1,000, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both." 31 U.S.C. § 5322(b) provided that "[a] person willfully violating" the reporting regulation "as part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period, shall be fined not more than $500,000, imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both." 31 U.S.C. § 5322(a) has since been amended to provide for a fine of not more than $250,000 and/or imprisonment for not more than five years, thus making any violation a felony, but this amendment is not relevant here.

---

[5] The Comptroller General of the United States had specifically criticized the Secretary of the Treasury for failing to make clear any duty to report such structured transactions. As the Comptroller General pointed out: "The regulations were silent on the propriety of a customer's conducting multiple transactions to avoid reporting. . . . [A]lthough the regulations required reporting for each single transaction above $10,000, they did not specifically prohibit dividing a large transaction into several smaller transactions to circumvent the reporting requirement." Comptroller General, Report to Congress, "Bank Secrecy Act Reporting Requirements Have Not Yet Met Expectations, Suggesting Need For Amendment," GGD-81-80, at 23-24 (July 23, 1981).

[6] See 52 Fed. Reg. 11436 (April 8, 1987) (amending 31 C.F.R. § 103.22(a)(1) to provide that "[m]ultiple currency transactions shall be treated as a single transaction if the financial institution has knowledge that they are by or on behalf of any person and result in either cash in or cash out totalling more than

There was confusion within the Bank as well. At trial, the evidence established that the tellers who were responsible for filing CTRs in the branch where Mr. McDonough banked did not understand that his structured transactions were reportable.[7] At the same time, the official in the Bank headquarters who understood that the IRS was seeking information even on such structured transactions knew nothing of Mr. McDonough or his transactions at any time during the period charged in the indictment.[8] In short, there was no evidence that anyone in the Bank made a conscious choice not to file the reports at issue — or even made a conscious choice to avoid compliance by intentionally compartmentalizing knowledge of facts and law.

No such choice was required, however, according to the instructions of the district court.[9] Rather, the jury was instructed that a corporation could be convicted of a specific intent crime even if none of its employees ever chose consciously to violate $10,000 during any one business day"). The Bank has maintained throughout this case that it violated no law by failing to report Mr. McDonough's structured transactions. Because the ambiguity in the law has now been removed, however, and banks now, for the first time, have clear notice that structured transactions are reportable, the Bank does not urge certiorari to review that claim here.

---

[7] One of the tellers who was indicted along with the Bank testified that she thought McDonough's transactions non-reportable because she believed he never withdrew more than $10,000 from any single account. See 1st Cir. App. 1662-65, 1753-58, 2646-62. The other indicted teller testified that she thought reports were required only when an individual check exceeded $10,000, as none of McDonough's did. See id. 1832-33, 1838, 1858-61. Both tellers were acquitted of all charges. See A4.

[8] See 1st Cir. App. 807-13, 2317-18. There was not a shred of evidence that the failure to report the McDonough transactions was part of a larger pattern of non-compliance which might have triggered the attention of headquarters' officials. Quite the contrary, internal audits and examinations by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency had both repeatedly found the Bank fully in compliance with the currency transaction reporting requirements. See 1st Cir. App. 865-66, 962-63, 1547-51, 2562-65, 2575-79, 2762-63.

[9] The transcript of the trial court's charge to the jury on the element of "willfulness" is reprinted in full in Appendix D to this Petition.

or disregard the law. Over the objection of the Bank, the trial judge charged that the Bank could be found to have had specific intent to violate the law simply because of "some flagrant organizational indifference," A39, or even because it was "plainly indifferent," A40, based on "the sum of the knowledge of all of the employees," A38.

Nor was the jury limited in the number of felonies for which it could convict the Bank. The trial court ruled, as the indictment charged, that if a "pattern" of such wrongdoing were established, each and every failure to file a report — failures that would otherwise merely be misdemeanors — was converted into a separate felony punishable by a fine of up to $500,000. See Appendix E.

The jury acquitted Mr. McDonough and the two bank tellers who had been charged along with the Bank. But it convicted the Bank on all 31 counts submitted to it.

On appeal, the court of appeals affirmed. While recognizing that this is a "specific intent" crime, the court held that corporate "indifference" was enough to meet that standard. See A23-A24. And while recognizing that another circuit had taken a different approach, the court approved treatment of each failure to file a report as a separate felony. See A17-A19. Each of these holdings calls out for this Court's review.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

This is a case in which a corporation was subject to conviction for its "indifference," not for the conscious wrongs of its employees, and in which a single pattern of such "indifference" was punished as 31 separate felonies. Some might think that these are desirable results. Some might think that policy should be shaped to produce them. Indeed, the Government said as much in its briefs in the court below. But those arguments should have been addressed to the Congress and the Treasury, not to the federal courts. In affirming the Bank's conviction, the court below assumed a role that the Constitution denies it, and reserves solely to the lawmaking branches. See McNally v. United States, 107 S. Ct. 2875, 2881 (1987); United States v. Boston & Me. R.R., 380 U.S. 157, 160 (1965) (quoting opinion of Marshall, C.J., in United States v. Wiltberger, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 76, 95 (1820)); United States v. Hudson & Goodwin, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 32 (1812).

Such judicial lawmaking increases dramatically the potential criminal liability of all corporations, not just the Bank. It threatens convictions for negligent inaction not only under the currency transaction reporting laws, but also under every federal criminal statute that has until now been limited by standards of specific intent. It raises the potential penalties for such violations by hundreds of millions of dollars. This Court should determine whether such grave changes in corporate criminal liability may be imposed by judicial fiat, rather than by duly enacted law.

I. WHETHER A CORPORATION MAY BE CONVICTED OF A SPECIFIC INTENT CRIME ON THE BASIS OF "ORGANIZATIONAL INDIFFERENCE" IS AN IMPORTANT QUESTION OF FEDERAL LAW.

The first issue calling for this Court's review is whether a corporation may be convicted of a specific intent crime even if none of its employees ever consciously chose to violate the law. There is simply no evidence that Congress ever intended such a result.

Only "willful" violations of the currency transaction reporting laws are criminal. 31 U.S.C. § 5322. Without exception, every court that has construed this willfulness requirement has concluded that willfulness here means specific intent. That is, "the defendant [must] have actually known of the currency reporting requirements and have voluntarily and intentionally violated that known legal duty in order to be convicted of the crime." United States v. Warren, 612 F.2d 887, 890 (5th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 956 (1980).[10] No court has ever suggested that the standard should be any looser for corporations than for individuals. And indeed, neither the Government nor the court below ever denied that just such specific intent was required here.

The trial court's instructions, however, strayed fatally from this requirement of specific intent. To be sure, the instructions on intent began unobjectionably, stating that "[k]nowingly simply means voluntarily and intentionally," and that "[w]illfully means voluntarily, intentionally, and with a specific intent to disregard, to disobey the law, with a bad purpose to violate the law." A33. And those instructions proceeded unobjectionably, to the extent they told the jury it could impute an employee's knowledge and intent to the bank: "if any employee knew that multiple checks would require the filing of reports, the bank knew it, provided the employee knew it within the scope of his employment," A38, and "[t]he bank is deemed to have acted willfully if one of its employees in the scope of his employment acted willfully," A38.

But the instructions went awry in laying out a second, alternative theory: that specific intent could be found even if no employee knew the law and chose to violate it, and even if the Bank was guilty of nothing more than indifference to its obligations. Terming intent a "double business" in this case, the trial court told the jury it could look not only at the knowledge and purposes of the bank's employees, but also at "the bank as an institution." A38, A37. As for knowledge of legal duty, the jury could "sum" up the knowledge of "separate employees" and attribute that sum to the bank, A38; if one employee knew the law and another the facts, the "institution" could thus be deemed to know both, even though no person did. And as for willful violation of that duty, "flagrant organizational indifference" was enough — a threshold that was dropped even lower when, in response to a juror's question, the court stated that the bank could be found guilty if "as an institution [it] was plainly indifferent to its obligations." A39, A40.

---

[10] Accord, United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540, 1543 (11th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S. Ct. 791 (1985); United States v. Sans, 731 F.2d 1521, 1529 (11th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S. Ct. 791 (1985); United States v. Dichne, 612 F.2d 632, 636 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 928 (1980); United States v. Chen, 605 F.2d 433, 435-36 (9th Cir. 1979); United States v. Schnaiderman, 568 F.2d 1208, 1212 (5th Cir. 1978); United States v. Granda, 565 F.2d 922, 926 (5th Cir. 1978).

The First Circuit affirmed these instructions, holding flatly that "[a] collective knowledge instruction is entirely appropriate in the context of corporate criminal liability," A22, and that a "flagrant indifference" instruction is appropriate because "the Supreme Court has endorsed defining willfulness, in both civil and criminal contexts, as 'a disregard for the governing statute and an indifference to its requirements.'" A23-A24. In support of this holding, the court cited a line of railroad and truck safety cases, beginning with this Court's decision in United States v. Illinois Central Ry. Co., 303 U.S. 239 (1938). See A24.

The Illinois Central line of cases indeed held corporations liable for "willful" violations of various railroad and trucking regulations on the basis of their organizational "indifference" to their duties. But the court below said not a word to explain why Congress's language in the Bank Secrecy Act should be read in light of this line of decisions, all of which openly acknowledge that far less is required to show willfulness in such "public safety" violations than in crimes requiring a showing of specific intent, such as tax evasion.

Illinois Central, for example, was a case involving the 37-hour incarceration of cattle in a box-car. This violated a federal statute that limited such confinement to not more than 28 hours. Although the violation was held "knowing and willful" (and thus subject to civil penalties) despite evidence that it was "due to mere indifference, inadvertence or negligence," 303 U.S. at 244, the Court was careful to point out that more would be required for "offenses [in which] 'willfully' is . . . used to mean with evil purpose, criminal intent or the like," id. at 242.[11]

Fiscal offenses, as Congress must have known when it enacted the currency transaction reporting requirements in 1970, are in that latter category. In United States v. Murdock, 290 U.S. 389, 395 (1933), for example, this Court stated that, as to penal tax offenses, "an evil motive is a constituent element of the crime." In United States v. Bishop, 412 U.S. 346 (1973), Justice Blackmun wrote for the Court that, "[u]ntil Congress speaks otherwise, we . . . shall continue to require, in both tax felonies and tax misdemeanors that must be done 'willfully,' the bad purpose or evil motive described in Murdock," id. at 361 — a requirement that Justice Blackmun reformulated

---

[11] In a handful of later cases, lower federal courts borrowed the civil willfulness standard from Illinois Central in criminal cases, likewise equating corporate "indifference" with "willfulness." See, e.g., Riss & Co., Inc. v. United States, 262 F.2d 245 (8th Cir. 1958) (maximum driving time by truck drivers); United States v. Sawyer Transport, Inc., 337 F. Supp. 29 (D. Minn. 1971), aff'd, 463 F.2d 175 (8th Cir. 1972) (falsification of truck drivers' logs); United States v. T.I.M.E.-D.C., Inc., 381 F. Supp. 730 (W.D. Va. 1974) (truck driving while sick). But they did so solely in contexts of minor misdemeanors where no specific intent was required, and, as the Court did in Illinois Central, they again expressly distinguished cases that did involve specific intent.

Similarly, in Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Thurston, 469 U.S. 111 (1985), where this Court held "reckless disregard" enough to show "willfulness" for purposes of punitive civil damages under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, it did so only in a context where "evil motive or bad purpose" was not required, and the employer need not have "intended to violate the Act." Id. at 126-27 & n.19. Thurston was thus firmly placed on the same track as the Illinois Central line of cases, and has no bearing on crimes Congress intended to require specific intent.

as "a voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty," id. at 360. And in United States v. Pomponio, 429 U.S. 10 (1976) (per curiam), this Court reiterated that tax crimes require a showing of "'a voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty,'" id. at 12 (quoting Bishop), even while holding the words "bad purpose or evil motive" unnecessary to a proper instruction on specific intent.

That Congress had every reason to treat the currency transaction reporting laws as falling into this "specific intent" category is confirmed by the fact that every lower court construing those laws has held them analogous to the laws criminalizing tax evasion — not to laws limiting the hours that truck drivers may drive or farm animals may be caged. As the lower courts have uniformly held, currency transaction reporting violations "require proof of the defendant's knowledge of the reporting requirement and his specific intent to commit the crime." United States v. Granda, 565 F.2d 922, 926 (5th Cir. 1978). See pp. 7-8 & n.10 supra.

To apply the "plain indifference" standard developed for "willful" violations of railroad and trucking safety regulations to a case where Congress must be deemed to have required proof of specific intent is to expand the bounds of corporate liability far beyond the limits that Congress chose to set. The significance of this case is not limited to the Bank of New England, or even to the Bank Secrecy Act, but extends to all corporations, and to all criminal laws that Congress intended to limit to cases of specific intent. For under the standards applied by the courts below, it is difficult to conceive of any failure by a bank or corporation to file required forms, pay taxes, or otherwise fulfill its legal duties that could not be deemed "willful." Virtually every such omission could presumably be traced to some lack of communication or the sort of "indifference" that was enough for multiple felony convictions here. And virtually every such omission could therefore be subject to multi-million dollar fines. Congress is free to impose such strict liability upon banks and corporations — if and when it chooses to do so. But under our constitutional principles of separated powers and due process, courts are not similarly free.

II. WHETHER A "PATTERN" OF CURRENCY TRANSACTION REPORTING VIOLATIONS GIVES RISE TO A SINGLE FELONY, OR INSTEAD TO A SEPARATE FELONY FOR EVERY VIOLATION THAT IS PART OF THE PATTERN, IS AN IMPORTANT QUESTION OF FEDERAL LAW THAT HAS DIVIDED THE CIRCUITS.

Even if the Bank had been properly charged and convicted for violating the Bank Secrecy Act, the question remains how many felony violations a court can properly read into Congress' words. Three circuit courts of appeals have now confronted the language of the felony enhancement provision of the Bank Secrecy Act, and have approved substantially different interpretations of what Congress meant. The result is that the same acts, done in different circuits, expose a financial institution to vastly different potential fines, and individuals to vastly different maximum prison terms.

At the time of the transactions at issue in this case, the Bank Secrecy Act provided that a single willful failure to file a required CTR was a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for up to one year. Felony liability was provided for a "pattern" of such violations:

> A person willfully violating this subchapter or a regulation prescribed under this subchapter . . . as part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period, shall > be fined not more than $500,000, imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

31 U.S.C. § 5322 (a), (b).[12]

These words leave wholly unclear whether each pattern constitutes a single felony, as the Bank has argued, or whether each violation which is part of a pattern may constitute a separate felony, as the court below held, or whether the number of felonies should be reckoned by each 12-month period or by each $100,000 worth of violations. Different prosecutors, and different lower courts, have adopted different conclusions. Under our system of government, Congress cannot have intended any such latitude.

The first court of appeals to confront the problem was the Ninth Circuit. In United States v. Beusch, 596 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1979), that court upheld the Government's authority to charge four felonies based on 377 misdemeanor violations involving $11 million over a four year period.[13] Applying here the Beusch methodology, in which one felony was charged for each twelve-month period, two felonies could be charged. In United States v. Kattan-Kassin, 696 F.2d 893, 896 (11th Cir. 1983), the Eleventh Circuit concluded that it was proper to charge 11 felony counts involving some $7 million of transactions, since 11 transactions constituted the pattern. In doing

---

[12] While these provisions have since been amended to increase the penalties, the structural questions at issue here, and the language upon which they are based, remain unchanged.

[13] Beusch was governed by the predecessor felony provision, identical for all relevant purposes, then codified as 31 U.S.C. § 1059(2). The felony provisions in both versions treat foreign transaction reporting violations, such as that in Beusch, the same as domestic reporting violations.

Judge Bright, dissenting in Beusch, would not have allowed the Government to charge any felonies where all that was involved were a series of misdemeanor violations; "[s]uch a criminal statute of uncertain scope calls for strict construction and leniency in application." 596 F.2d at 881.

so, however, the Eleventh Circuit acknowledged that under its interpretation, shared by the First Circuit here, there simply could never be a single felony. More recently, the Ninth Circuit approved yet another approach in United States v. So, 755 F.2d 1350, 1355 (9th Cir. 1985), where it found that each failure could be charged as a separate felony but only after the $100,000 threshold had been reached in a twelve month period. Applying the So methodology here would reduce the number of felonies by ten — fully one-third.

The fact of such a conflict — and the uncertainty and unfairness that conflict creates — serves as a compelling argument for this Court's review. Moreover, even a cursory review of the legislative history suggests that not only does the view of the First Circuit conflict with that of the Ninth; it also appears to conflict with that of the Congress.

The only justification offered by the First Circuit in this case for choosing the approach it did was that "Congress intended that the section be used to punish violators severely"; counting each failure as a separate felony maximized the number of crimes and thus assured such "severe punishment." See A20-21. But the First Circuit's approach in fact conflicts with the apparent intent of Congress.

In Congress' view, the "serious violations" to be punished as felonies were those which "involve very large sums of money" — those in which "fines of as much as $10,000 or more might be shrugged off as a mere cost of doing business." H.R. Rep. No. 975, 91st Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in 1970 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 4394, 4406. Under the approach adopted by the court below, however, liability turns on the number of trips to the Bank, not the amount of money involved. One million dollars withdrawn in two trips amounts to two felonies; $101,000 withdrawn in ten trips amounts to ten felonies — or five times as much punishment for one-tenth as much money. The examples are not simply hypotheticals: Kattan-

Kassin involved ten times the amount of money — but only a third the number of felonies — as did this case.

Nor is there any evidence supporting the inherently implausible view that Congress, in passing the felony enhancement provision, intended that there could never be a single felony, and that the penalty limits it deliberately set instead be only half-way points. Yet since it is undisputed in the case law that a "pattern" must necessarily consist of at least two violations, United States v. Dickinson, 706 F.2d 88, 91-92 (2d Cir. 1983), that is the inevitable result of the approach approved by the Eleventh Circuit in Kattan-Kassin and the First Circuit here.

The Bank has consistently argued that principles of both plain meaning and lenity compel the adoption of the most natural reading of the felony provision: that "[a] person willfully violating" the reporting regulations may be subjected to a felony fine of half a million dollars only once for each "pattern" of which those violations are "part." But even if that natural reading is rejected, and the apparent intent of Congress ignored, the best that can be said of the approach adopted below is that it is one of a number of plausible judicial guesses as to the construction of the penalty provision — certainly no more plausible than the Bank's reading, or the different approaches of the Ninth Circuit in Beusch and So.

Remarkably, the court below conceded as much, admitting that "[b]oth the Ninth Circuit and the Eleventh Circuit have advanced plausible constructions of the Act's felony provisions." A18-A19. But the court here sought to justify its entry into this guessing game by asserting that the verdict was still within the maximum fine that could have been imposed even under the approach of the Ninth Circuit. See A18.

That assertion was wrong as a matter of fact, for under the approach of the Ninth Circuit in Beusch as opposed to So, there could have been charged no more than two felonies here, for a maximum total fine of $1 million — less than the $1.24 million fine in fact imposed. Moreover, as a matter of law, that assertion was hardly enough to uphold this judgment: the sentence (of $40,000 per count) might well have been lower, and the jury less prone to convict, had fewer counts been charged. But most important, the court's express concession belies any claim to reasonable certainty in its construction of this statute.

It is the very fact of such guesswork that triggers due process and separation of powers concerns deserving of the attention of this Court. It has long been established that the legislative branch alone must set the terms of punishment and that "[n]o one may be required at peril of life, liberty or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes." Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453 (1939). This is as true for the "unit of prosecution" as for the definition of the elements of the offense. See United States v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 344 U.S. 218, 221-22 (1952); Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81, 83 (1955) ("When Congress has the will it has no difficulty in expressing it — when it has the will, that is, of defining what it desires to make the unit of prosecution . . . ."). "When Congress leaves to the Judiciary the task of imputing to Congress an undeclared will, the ambiguity should be resolved in favor of lenity." Id. "This policy of lenity means that the Court will not interpret a federal criminal statute so as to increase the penalty that it places on an individual when such an interpretation can be based on no more than a guess as to what Congress intended." Ladner v. United States, 358 U.S. 169, 178 (1958).

Only this Court's review can end the game of speculation engaged in by the First, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits. Even more critical, only this Court's review will assure not only the Bank of New England, but every institution subject to this and other similarly ambiguous statutes, the process that the Constitution says is due — process of law, not of judicial hunch.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, petitioner Bank of New England respectfully urges this Court to review and reverse the decision of the court of appeals.

Respectfully submitted,

LAURENCE H. TRIBE
Counsel of Record
SUSAN ESTRICH
KATHLEEN M. SULLIVAN
1525 Massachusetts Avenue
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138
(617) 495-4621
Attorneys for Petitioner

Of Counsel:
MARK A. MICHELSON
AMOS HUGH SCOTT
CHOATE, HALL & STEWART
Exchange Place
53 State Street
Boston, Massachusetts 02109
(617) 227-5020

August 31, 1987

APPENDIX

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Appendix A

Opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, dated June 10, 1987 A1

Appendix B

Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, entered June 10, 1987 A31

Appendix C

Order of the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit Denying Rehearing, entered July 6, 1987 A32

Appendix D

Excerpt from the Transcript of Trial for February 14, 1986 (pages 18-27, 30-31): The Trial Court's Instructions to the Jury on the Element of "Willfulness" A33

Appendix E

Excerpt from the Transcript of Trial for February 14, 1986 (pages 27-29): The Trial Court's Instructions to the Jury on the Element of "Pattern" A41

APPENDIX A

United States Court of Appeals

For the First Circuit

No. 86-1334

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Plaintiff, Appellee,
v.
BANK OF NEW ENGLAND, N.A.,
Defendant, Appellant.

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS
[Hon. Rya W. Zobel, U.S. District Judge]

Before
Bownes and Selya, Circuit Judges, and Pettine,* Senior District Judge.

Laurence H. Tribe with whom Susan Estrich, Kathleen M. Sullivan, Mark A. Michelson, Amos Hugh Scott, and Choate, Hall & Stewart were on brief for appellant.

Sara Criscitelli, Attorney, Department of Justice, with whom Robert S. Mueller, III, United States Attorney for the District of Massachusetts, and John J.E. Markham, II, Assistant United States Attorney for the District of Massachusetts, were on brief for appellee.

June 10, 1987

* Of the District of Rhode Island, sitting by designation.

BOWNES, Circuit Judge. The Bank of New England appeals a jury verdict convicting it of thirty-one violations of the Currency Transaction Reporting Act (the Act).[1] 31 U.S.C. §§ 5311-22 (1982).[2] Department of Treasury regulations promulgated under the Act require banks to file Currency Transaction Reports (CTRs) within fifteen days of customer currency transactions exceeding $10,000. 31 C.F.R. § 103.22 (1986).[3]

---

[1] The Act is also referred to as the Bank Secrecy Act.

[2] The Act provides in relevant part:

> § 5313. Reports on domestic coins and currency transactions
>
> (a) When a domestic financial institution is involved in a transaction for the payment, receipt, or transfer of United States coins or currency (or other monetary instruments the Secretary of the Treasury prescribes), in an amount, denomination, or amount and denomination, or under circumstances the Secretary prescribes by regulation, the institution and any other participant in the transaction the Secretary may prescribe shall file a report on the transaction at the time and in the way the Secretary prescribes. A participant acting for another person shall make the report as the agent or bailee of the person and identify the person for whom the transaction is being made.
>
> § 5322. Criminal penalties
>
> (a) A person willfully violating this subchapter or a regulation prescribed under this subchapter (except section 5315 of this title or a regulation prescribed under section 5315) shall be fined not more than $1,000 imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.
>
> (b) A person willfully violating this subchapter or a regulation prescribed under this subchapter (except section 5315 of this title or a regulation prescribed under section 5315), while violating another law of the United States or as part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period, shall be fined no more than $500,000, imprisoned for not more than 5 years or both.

[3] The regulations then in effect provided:

> § 103.22 Reports of currency transactions
>
> (a) (1) Each financial institution, other than a casino shall file a report of each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment or transfer, by, through, or to such financial institution, which involves a transaction in currency of more than $10,000.

The Act imposes felony liability when a bank willfully fails to file such reports "as part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a twelve-month period . . . ." 31 U.S.C. § 5322(b).

I. THE ISSUES

The Bank was found guilty of having failed to file CTRs on cash withdrawals made by James McDonough. It is undisputed that on thirty-one separate occasions between May 1983 and July 1984, McDonough withdrew from the Prudential Branch of the Bank more than $10,000 in cash by using multiple checks — each one individually under $10,000 — presented simultaneously to a single bank teller. The Bank contends that such conduct did not trigger the Act's reporting requirements. It also urges that felony liability should not have been imposed because it did not engage in a pattern of illegal activity. In addition, the Bank avers that, if it did commit a felony violation, it did not commit thirty-one of them. The Bank also argues that the trial judge's instructions on willfulness were fatally flawed, and that, in any event, the evidence did not suffice to show that it willfully failed to file CTRs on McDonough's transactions. Finally, the Bank submits that during her charge to the jury, the trial judge erroneously alluded to evidence of the Bank's conduct after the dates specified in the indictment.

The Bank had been named in a federal grand jury indictment which was returned on October 15, 1985. Count One of the indictment alleged that between May 1983 and May 1985, James McDonough, the Bank, and Carol Orlandella and Patricia Murphy — both of whom were former head tellers with the Bank's Prudential Branch — unlawfully conspired to conceal from the IRS thirty-six of McDonough's currency transactions. The trial court directed a verdict of acquittal on this count. Defendants Murphy and Orlandella were found not guilty of charges that they individually aided and abetted the failure to file CTRs on McDonough's transactions.

The bulk of the indictment alleged that the Bank, as principal, and McDonough, as an aider and abetter, willfully failed to file CTRs on thirty-six occasions between May 1983 and July 1984. Five counts were dismissed because, on those occasions, McDonough received cashier's checks from the Bank, rather than currency. McDonough was acquitted of all charges against him. The Bank was found guilty on the thirty-one remaining counts. We affirm.

II. THE REPORTABILITY OF McDONOUGH'S TRANSACTIONS

The evidence at trial revealed that from 1978 through September 1984, McDonough was a regular customer at the Prudential Branch of the Bank of New England. McDonough visited that branch several times a month to withdraw large sums of cash from various corporate accounts. On thirty-one occasions from May 1983 through July 1984, McDonough requested a number of counter checks — blank checks which a teller encodes with the customer's account number — which he would then make payable to cash for sums varying between $5,000 and $9,000. On each of the charged occasions, McDonough simultaneously presented to a teller between two and four counter checks, none of which individually amounted to $10,000, Each check was recorded separately as an "item" on the Bank's settlement sheets. Once the checks were processed, McDonough would receive in a single transfer from the teller, one lump sum of cash which always amounted to over $10,000. On each of the charged occasions, the cash was withdrawn from one account. The Bank did not file CTRs on any of these transactions until May 1985, shortly after it received a grand jury subpoena.

The Bank contends that its conviction must be overturned because it did not engage in conduct that can be construed as violative of the Currency Transaction Reporting Act. It argues that the Act and its implementing regulations do not provide fair warning that a violation occurs of a financial institution fails to report a cash withdrawal in excess of $10,000 effected by a customer's use of multiple checks, each of which is less than $10,000. The Bank submits that since that Act fails to give sufficient notice that such conduct triggers the reporting requirements, its conviction violates fundamental norms of due process. It points out that the Constitution forbids the conviction of a defendant for conduct not clearly proscribed by penal statutes. United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 348 (1971); Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453 (1939); United States v. Anzalone, 776 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1985). The Bank asserts that to convict it for conduct not expressly prohibited by the Currency Transaction Reporting Act offends the basic constitutional canon that "the power of punishment is vested in the legislative, not in the judicial[,] department." United States v. Boston & Me. R.R., 380 U.S. 157, 160 (1965) (quoting United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76 (1820).

The Currency Transaction Reporting Act instructs the Treasury Department to promulgate regulations specifying the circumstances and currency amounts which trigger the Act's reporting requirements. 31 U.S.C. § 5313 (1982). The Treasury regulations, promulgated in 1972, provide: "Each financial institution . . . shall file a report of each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment or transfer . . . to such financial institution, which involves a transaction in currency of more than $10,000." 31 C.F.R. § 103.22 (1986). The question is whether the due process requirement of fair warning forbids us from reading this regulation as imposing a duty on banks to file reports on customers who withdraw more than $10,000 in cash at one time by using two to four checks instead of only one check.

The Treasury regulations define "transaction in currency" to mean a "transaction involving the physical transfer of currency from one person to another." 31 C.F.R. § 103.11 (1986). In the instant case, McDonough's practice was to visit the same branch of the same bank on only one occasion in a single day. He simultaneously would present to a single bank teller two to four checks, all made payable to cash, for varying amounts under $10,000 which, when added together, equalled a sum greater than $10,000. In return, the same bank teller would transfer to him in a single motion a wad of cash totalling more than $10,000.

We have no trouble categorizing such conduct as a single physical transfer of currency in excess of $10,000 from the Bank to McDonough. We, therefore, conclude that the language of the regulations itself gave the Bank fair warning that McDonough's transaction were reportable. This case does not, as the Bank suggests, involve a bank customer engaging in multiple currency transactions. McDonough engaged in thirty-one separate transactions, each exceeding $10,000, which were effected by the use of multiple checks. The use of multiple checks during a single transfer of currency is not the same as multiple currency transactions. Thus, the Bank's citation of comments from agency officials, such as the IRS Assistant Commissioner for Criminal Investigation, about the reportability of multiple transactions is irrelevant. These comments have no bearing on the resolution of this case but, instead, are addressed to situations in which a customer obtains over $10,000 via more than one physical transfer of currency.[4] E.g., United States v. Reinis, 794 F.2d 506 (9th Cir. 1986) (cash withdrawal exceeding $10,000 effected by defendant's and his agents' purchase of several cashier's checks from the same bank in a single day but at different times, held not reportable since there was no single transfer of currency exceeding $10,000 to either defendant personally or any one of his agents); United States v. Dela Espierella, 781 F 1432 (9th Cir. 1986) (defendant who obtained more than $100,000 currency a day by sending several agents to 19 different bank locations to purchase cashier's checks for less than $10,000 each did not engage in a reportable transaction); United States v. Varbel, 780 F.2d 758 (9th Cir. 1986) (no CTRs required to be filed on defendant who obtained $50,000 in three days by purchasing six cashier's checks, each under $10,000, from six different banks); United States v. Denemark, 779 F.2d 1559 (11th Cir. 1986) (CTR need not be filed on defendant who purchased 14 checks for approximately $9,900 each from 14 different financial institutions); United States v. Cogswell, 637 F. Supp. 295 (N.D. Cal. 1985) (no CTR required to be filed on defendant who purchased three different cashier's checks each slightly less than $10,000 at three different banks in a single day).

---

[4] For example, the Bank cites the following statement from the Comptroller General:

> The regulations were silent on the propriety of a customer's conducting multiple transactions to avoid reporting . . . .
>
> . . . .
>
> . . . . Similarly, although the regulations required reporting for each single transaction above $10,000, they did not specifically prohibit dividing a large transaction into several smaller transactions to circumvent the reporting requirement.

Comptroller General, Report to Congress, Bank Secrecy Reporting Requirements Have Not Yet Met Expectations, Suggesting Need for Amendment, GGD-81-80, at 23-24 (1981)

Indeed, the IRS Assistant Commissioner for Criminal Investigation specifically discussed Varbel, Denemark, and Cogswell immediately after stating that the Treasury regulations do not require "that multiple currency transactions on the same day (each less that $10,000) that aggregate more than $10,000, be reported by a financial institution." Tax Evasion, Drug Trafficking and Money Laundering as They Involve Financial Institutions: Hearings Before The Subcomm. on Financial Institutions Supervision, Regulation and Insurance of the House Comm. on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 181 (1986).

The instant case does not involve a defendant employing several agents to purchase a number of checks, each under $10,000, from the same bank in a single day. Nor does it involve a single defendant visiting different banks on the same day; or different branches of the same bank on the same or different days; or even different visits to the same branch of the same bank on the same day. The fact that such practices may be regarded as multiple transactions, and their reportability under the act may be uncertain, is of no moment here. It is undisputed that each of the violations charged in the indictment involved a single, lump-sum transfer of more than $10,000 to McDonough from the Bank's Prudential Branch. McDonough's method of withdrawing more than $10,000 in cash can be regarded as multiple transactions only by disregarding the fact that he would make but one visit in a day to the same branch of the same bank where he would simultaneously present more than one check to one teller who would hand him in one motion a single sum of cash exceeding $10,000. McDonough could be said to have engaged in multiple transactions only by reading the regulations as attaching paramount importance to the number of checks presented by a customer. The regulations, however, impart primary significance to the amount of currency transferred, defining transaction as "the physical transfer of currency from one person to another." 31 C.F.R. § 103.11. On every occasion for which it was found guilty, the Bank transferred more than $10,000 to McDonough in a single act.

This case falls squarely within the Act's reporting requirements because it involves the physical transfer of more than $10,000 in currency from one bank in one day to a single customer during a single visit. A survey of the case law indicates that when a customer uses several checks, each of which is less than $10,000, in order to withdraw more than $10,000 from the same bank on the same day, he has engaged in a reportable transaction. See United States v. Cure, 804 F.2d 625, 629 (11th Cir. 1986) ("purchase of multiple cashier's checks in an aggregate amount of more than $10,000 from different branches of the same bank on the same day constitutes a single transaction in excess of $10,000"); United States v. Heyman, 794 F.2d 788, 792 (2d Cir.) (financial institution must report a customer deposit exceeding $10,000 which had been divided into small sums and in a single day deposited into different accounts held by the same customer in the same financial institution), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 585 (1986); United States v. Giancola, 783 F.2d 1549 (11th Cir.) (bank must file CTRs on defendants who purchased over $10,000 in cashier's checks in a single day by structuring transactions in amounts of less than $10,000 at different branches of the same bank), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 669 (1986); United States v. Tobon-Builes, 706 F.2d 1092 (11th Cir. 1983) (defendant's conduct, whereby on ten occasions he entered bank and each time simultaneously purchased two cashier's checks for $9,000, "clearly came within the ambit of the financial institution reporting requirements"); United States v. Thompson, 603 F.2d 1200 (5th Cir. 1979) (bank employee who divided $45,000 loan into five $9,000 notes and then simultaneously handed five bundles of $9,000 cash to borrower, properly convicted of failing to file a CTR on a $45,000 transaction).

As some of the cases cited hold, the reporting requirements may attach, even if a customer obtains $10,000 or more by visiting different branches of the same bank at various times in a single day. This is not the situation here; McDonough always obtained more than $10,000 cash by making one visit on a given day to the same branch of the same bank. We need not decide whether the current regulations can be read to impose a reporting obligation when a customer receives more than $10,000 currency by making numerous visits on the same day to different branches of the same bank. The Treasury Department, at the urging of other branches of government, recently has amended the current regulations so that they expressly obligate financial institutions to treat as a single reportable transaction, multiple currency transactions by a customer which total more than $10,000 in a single day.[5] This amendment is irrelevant to the matter before us, since McDonough did not engage in multiple currency transactions.

The Bank relies heavily on our decision in United States v. Anzalone, 766 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1985). In that case, we overturned a bank customer's conviction for violations of the Act. The defendant in Anzalone had purchased three checks on November 13, 1980, from the Haymarket Cooperative Bank. Each of the checks was less than $10,000, but in the

---

[5] The amendment reads as follows:

> § 103.22 Reports of currency of transactions.
>
> (a) (1) Each financial institution other than a casino shall file a report of each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment, or transfer, by, through, or to such financial institution which involves a transaction in currency of more than $10,000. Multiple currency transactions shall be treated as a single transaction if the financial institution has knowledge that they are by or on behalf of any person and result in either cash in or cash out totalling more than $10,000 during any one business day . . . .

52 Fed. Reg. 11436 (April 8, 1987).

aggregate they amounted to $25,000. Thereafter, the defendant purchased nine different checks on nine separate days, totalling $75,000. None of the checks individually, however, exceeded $10,000. We held that nothing in either the Act or its regulations obligated a bank customer to report cash withdrawals of $10,000 or more. 766 F.2d at 681-82. Anzalone also had been convicted of willfully aiding and abetting the Haymarket Bank's failure to file a CTR. We reversed that conviction, holding that "[t]he Bank, under the circumstances of this case, did not commit any crime by failing to report transactions as it lacked knowledge of their 'structured' nature." 766 F.2d at 683.

Anzalone held that the Treasury Regulations then in effect imposed no duty on a customer to inform a financial institution that he or she is structuring to avoid the Act's reporting requirements. The case also held that the Haymarket Bank did not have to report transactions that it did not know were being structured to avoid the Act's reporting requirements. Judge Aldrich concurred with this holding, but wrote separately to emphasize his view that the bank did have a duty to report the November 13, 1980, withdrawal in which Anzalone acquired three $8,500 checks from three separate tellers at two different branches of the Haymarket Bank. The government, however, chose to lump Anzalone's conduct on November 13 with his actions on the nine separate days thereafter, when he purchased nine different checks, totalling $75,000, each of which was slightly less than $10,000. Thus, the government's presentation of the case rendered it unnecessary for the court to decide whether Anzalone's November 12 transaction was reportable. Judge Aldrich, therefore, had no reason to diverge from the court's main holding. 766 F.2d at 683-84.

Anzalone involved the reportability of two kinds of transactions. First, it held that the Act does not require a bank to report multiple transactions undertaken on different days which aggregate to more than $10,000, if the bank does not know the transactions are being structured to avoid the Act's reporting requirements. 766 F.2d at 683. Second, Anzalone, did not decide whether a customer engages in a reportable transaction when he obtains more than $10,000 by receiving a total of three transfers of currency from two branches of the same bank in a single day. Anzalone thus does not foreclose a holding that both these kind of transactions are reportable. But more importantly, the facts of the instant case are wholly distinguishable from either of these two situations. Anzalone, therefore, has no direct bearing on the issues before us.

On thirty-one occasions, James McDonough visited the same branch of the same bank at one time in a single day. He presented between two and four checks totalling more than $10,000 to one bank teller and received from the teller a single sum of cash in excess of $10,000. Since the regulations define transactions in currency to mean "the physicial transfer of currency from one person to another," we hold that the Bank had adequate warning that a single, lump-sum transfer of cash excceeding $10,000 was reportable, regardless of the number of checks the customer uses to obtain the money.

III. THE IMPOSITION OF FELONY LIABILITY ON THE BANK

A. The "Pattern" Instruction

31 U.S.C. § 5322(b) provides in pertinent part:

> (b) A person willfully violating this subchapter or a regulation prescribed under this subchapter (except section 5315 of this title or a regulation prescribed under section 5315), . . . as part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period shall be fined . . . .

The Bank claims that the jury was erroneously instructed on the definition of "a pattern of illegal activity" and that, therefore, a new trial is necessary. Before we examine the pattern instruction, we note that the Bank did not, despite the provisions of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 30, object to the instructed definition. This means that the instruction must stand unless it constituted plai rror. United States v. Krowen, 809 F.2d 144, 150 (1st Cir. 1987); United States v. Kakley, 741 F.2d 1, 3 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 887 (1984). Nor did the Bank submit a suggested definition of pattern in its requests for instructions.

The district court's instruction was:

> Pattern simply means repeated transactions. One transaction is not a pattern; two may not be either, but it you get a series of transactions, that may then be a pattern. And in this context, what we're talking about is a pattern of repeated failures to file required reports on these transactions.
>
> The Government must prove that the transactions involved more than $100,000 in a 12-month period. No one transaction has to be greater than $100,000, so long as the total of the transactions is in any 12-month period. It's a shifting period, so you can look at any period that you want. And if within that period, transactions of more than $100,000 occurred and there was a willful failure to file with respect to them, then this fourth element has been satisfied.
>
> So, if you find that a series of transactions occurred that required the filing of reports and that the total of such transactions in any 12-month period involved more than $100,000, this element is satisfied, even if no one transaction itself exceeded 100,000 dollars. It is kind of a fillip on the multiple business. So, if > you find that a reportable transaction occurred, that no report was filed, that transaction may be considered as part of the pattern if others occurred and if in any 12-month period the total was more than $100,000.

The Bank attacks the instruction on two grounds: that the definition of pattern is impermissibly broad; and the court failed to distinguish between a pattern of conduct by the defendant McDonough and a pattern of activity by the Bank. We reject both contentions.

There are three cases construing "a pattern of illegal activity" under the Act. In United States v. Dickinson, 706 F.2d 88 (2d Cir. 1983), the court appeared to adopt the following definition: "the pattern of illegal activity must involve repeated violations of the Act itself, related to each other and together involving more than $100,000." Id. at 91 (emphasis added). The court stated later: "The requirement that the violations be part of a pattern merely excludes cases where the violations are isolated events and not part of a common or systematic scheme." Id. at 92.

The Ninth Circuit in United States v. Beusch, 596 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1979), discussed the meaning of pattern under 31 U.S.C. § 1059, the predecessor statute of § 5322(b):

> First, the plain language of subsection (2) of § 1059 indicates to us that a series of currency transfers which, by themselves, constitute only misdemeanors, may also constitute felonious activity if they (a) show a pattern of illegal activity, and (b) exceed $100,000 over a 12-month period. In contrast to subsection (1) of § 1059, which requires other illegal activity (i.e., activity not involving violations of the Bank Secrecy Act), subsection (2) evidences > no similar requirements. We infer therefore, that a series of misdemeanor violations of the act may, by themselves, call forth the increased penalties of subsection (2).

Id. at 878 (emphasis added).

The most recent case we could find on the subject is United States v. Valdes-Guerra, 758 F.2d 1411 (11th Cir. 1985). The court stated:

> While there is little caselaw construing the phrase "pattern of illegal activity," both circuits which have directly confronted the issue had held that a series of currency reporting violations which, by themselves, constitute only misdemeanors may also be felonious if they show a pattern of illegal activity and exceed $100,000.00 over a twelve-month period. United States v. Dickinson, 706 F.2d 88, 91-93 (2d Cir. 1983); United States v. Beusch, 596 F.2d 871, 878-79 (9th Cir. 1979). We agree with those courts that the legislative history of section 5322(b) evinces an intent not only to deal seriously with reporting violations undertaken in conjunction with violations of other federal laws, but also to punish as a felony violations undertaken in a repeated manner which "involve very large sums of money." H.R. Rep. No. 91-975, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970), 1970 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 4394, 4406. Congress intended that "serious violations under this title" could not "be shrugged off as a mere cost of doing business." Id. (emphasis added); Dickinson, 706 F.2d at 92.

Id. at 1414 (emphasis added).

The common theme running though these three cases is that a pattern consists of repeated violations or a series of violations. The court's instructions clearly embodied this. While the instruction might have been more accurate if it defined pattern as repeated and related violations of the Act, the omission of the word related does not even come close to plain error. Under the evidence adduced, it was clear that the repeated failures by the Bank to report were directly related to the withdrawals by McDonough. These failures were not isolated events; they entailed repeated failures to file CTRs on similar transactions by the same customer. The similarity of the transactions, coupled with the frequency and regularity of their repetition, establish a related scheme.

The contention that the instruction did not distinguish between a pattern by McDonough and another by the Bank is technically correct, but it ignores the rest of the charge in which the court repeatedly informed the jury that each defendant must be judged separately. The court also pointed out that it was the Bank that had the duty to report the transactions. To argue that the Bank must be divorced from McDonough is to ignore reality; McDonough made the withdrawals. The question for the jury was whether the Bank knowingly and willfully broke the law by failing to report them.

We have a final comment. When a defendant fails to specifically request an instruction on "a crucial and potentially complex issue of fact for a jury," Appellant's Brief at 24, and then fails to object to the instruction given, one of two conclusions can be drawn: that the defendant deliberatley left the matter to the discretion of the trial judge; or it decided to play the waiting game in the hope of getting an appealable error without committing itself. Since we uphold the jury instruction, no more need be said.

B. Conviction of Thirty-One Felonies

This issue, which is an extension of the previous one, also involves the construction of 31 U.S.C. § 5322(b). At the time of indictment, the penalty for a violation of § 5322(b) was a fine of $500,00 and/or imprisonment for not more than five years. Section 5322(a) made a violation a misdemeanor with a fine of not more than $1,000 and/or imprisonment for not more than one year.[6] The question is whether each of the thirty-one violations that was "part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period" may be separately prosecuted as a felony or whether a pattern of violations within a 12-month period constitutes only a single felony offense. The district court ruled that, if a pattern of illegal activity was proven, each violation constituted a felony. The Bank duly objected to this construction of the statute.

Although the Bank argues that the ruling rewrote the statute in defiance of precedent, we find that the district court's ruling comports with the plain language of the statute and its legislative history and has solid precedential support. The statute makes it a crime for a person to violate the subchapter "as part of a pattern of illegal activity." The words "as part" can only refer to a single violation. In order for subsection (b) to apply, there must be "a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions exceeding $100,000 in any 12-month period." A pattern, by any definition, must consist of more than one failure to report. It is not the pattern that is proscribed, but the willful violation that is a part of the pattern. As the court noted in United States v. Katten-Kassin, 696 F.2d 893 (11th Cir. 1983), [6] 31 U.S.C. § 5322(b) has since been amended to increase the maximum prison term to ten years. Section 5322(a) has been amended to provide for a fine of not more than $250,000 and/or imprisonment for not more than five years, thus making any violation a felony.

---

an absurd result can occur if the felony is limited to the pattern of violations: "after committing two violations involving more than $100,000, a violator would be immune from prosecution [under § 5322(b)] for the remainder of the twelve-month period, subject only to minor misdemeanor penalties." Id. at 896.

There can be no doubt that the legislative history of section 5322(b) and its predecessor, 31 U.S.C. § 1059, shows that Congress intended that the section be used to punish violators severely. See United States v. Valdes-Guerra, 758 F.2d at 1414; United States v. So, 755 F.2d 1350, 1355 (9th Cir. 1985); United States v. Dickinson, 706 F.2d at 92; United States v. Kattan-Kassin, 696 F.2d at 897; United States v. Beusch, 596 F.2d at 879. Severe punishment can best be assured by treating as a separate felony each violation that is "part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions exceeding $100,000 in any 12-month period." 31 U.S.C. § 5322(b).

Although both the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits concur that Congress intended to punish severely those who repeatedly violate the Act's reporting requirements, they differ as to how best to implement that legislative intent. The Ninth Circuit does not regard any transaction as felonious until the $100,000 threshold has been reached, United States v. So, 755 F.2d at 1355; thereafter, every transaction is treated as a felony. The Eleventh Circuit, as we have already noted, treats every transaction as felonious if the $100,000 threshold is reached within a twelve-month period. Thus, under the Ninth Circuit's approach, there would be twenty-one felonies; under the Eleventh Circuit's approach, there would be thirty-one felonies. No matter which approach we adopt, the verdict stands since the fine levied against the Bank was far below that which could have been imposed under either approach. Both the Ninth Circuit and the Eleventh Circuit have advanced plausible constructions of the Act's felony provision. Because we are convinced that Congress wished to impose the severest possible penalty on repeated violators of the Act, we adopt the approach taken by the Eleventh Circuit in Kattan-Kassin: if a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions exceeding $100,000 is proven, each violation is a felony. We, therefore, affirm the district court's ruling and find no error in the jury instruction on this issue.

IV. WILLFULNESS OF THE BANK'S CONDUCT

A. The Trial Court's Instruction on Willfulness

Criminal liability under 31 U.S.C. § 5322 only attaches when a financial institution "willfully" violates the CTR filing requirement. A finding of willfulness under the Reporting Act must be supported by "proof of the defendant's knowledge of the reporting requirements and his specific intent to commit the crime." United States v. Hernando Ospina, 798 F.2d 1570, 1580 (11th Cir. 1986); United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540, 1543 (11th Cir. 1984). Willfulness can rarely be proven by direct evidence, since it is a state of mind; it is usually established by drawing reasonable inferences from the available facts. United States v. Wells, 766 F.2d 12, 20 (1st Cir. 1985).

The Bank contends that the trial court's instructions on knowledge and specific intent effectively relieved the government of its responsibility to prove that the Bank acted willfully. The trial judge began her instructions on this element by outlining generally the concepts of knowledge and willfulness:

> Knowingly simply means voluntarily and intentionally. It's designed to exclude a failure that is done by mistake or accident, or for some other innocent reason. Willfully means voluntarily, intentionally, > and with a specific intent to disregard, to disobey the law, with a bad purpose to violate the law.

The trial judge properly instructed the jury that it could infer knowledge if a defendant consciously avoided learning about the reporting requirements. The court then focused on the kind of proof that would establish the Bank's knowledge of its filing obligations. The judge instructed that the knowledge of individual employees acting within the scope of their employment is imputed to the Bank. She told the jury that "if any employee knew that multiple checks would require the filing of reports, the bank knew it, provided the employee knew it within the scope of his employment, ..."

The trial judge then focused on the issue of "collective knowledge":

> In addition, however, you have to look at the bank as an institution. As such, its knowledge is the sum of the knowledge of all of the employees. That is, the bank's knowledge is the totality of what all of the employees know within the scope of their employment. So, if Employee A knows one facet of the currency reporting requirement, B knows another facet of it, and C a third facet of it, the bank knows them all. So if you find that an employee within the scope of his emplolyment knew that CTRs had to be filed, even if multiple checks are used, the bank is deemed to know it. The bank is also deemded to know it if each of several employees knew a part of that requirement and the sum of what the separate employees know amounted to knowledge that such a requirement existed.

After discussing the two modes of establishing knowledge — via either knowledge of one of its individual employees or the aggregate knowledge of all its employees — the trial judge turned to the issue of specific intent:

> There is a similar double business with respect to the concept of willfulness with respect to the bank. In deciding whether the bank acted willfully, again you have to look first at the conduct of all employees and officers, and, second, at what the bank did or did not do as an institution. The bank is deemed to have acted willfully if one of its employees in the scope of his employment acted willfully. So, if you find that an employee willfully failed to do what was necessary to file these reports, then that is deemed to be the act of the bank, and the bank is deemed to have willfully failed to file.
>
> . . . .
>
> Alternatively, the bank as an institution has certain responsibilities; as an organization, it has certain responsibilities. And you will have to determine whether the bank as an organization consciously avoided learning about and observing CTR requirements. The Government to prove the bank guilty on this theory, has to show that its failure to file was the result of some flagrant organizational indifference. In this connection, you should look at the evidence as to the bank's effort, if any, to inform its employees of the law; its effort to check on their compliance; its response to various bits of information that it got in August and September of '84 and February of '85; its policies, and how it carried out its stated policies.
>
> . . . .
>
> If you find that the Government has proven with respect to any transaction either that an employee > within the scope of his employment willfully failed to file a required report or that the bank was flagrantly indifferent to its obligations, then you may find that the bank has willfully failed to file the required reports.

The Bank contends that the trial court's instructions regarding knowledge were defective because they eliminated the requirement that it be proven that the Bank violated a known legal duty. It avers that the knowledge instruction invited the jury to convict the Bank for negligently maintaining a poor communications network that prevented the consolidation of the information held by its various employees. The Bank argues that it is error to find that corporation possesses a particular item of knowledge if one part of the corporation has half the information making up the item, and another part of the entity has the other half.

A collective knowledge instruction is entirely appropriate is the context of corporate criminal liability. Riss & Company v. United States, 262 F.2d 245, 250 (8th Cir. 1958); Inland Freight Lines v. United States, 191 F.2d 313, 315 (10th Cir. 1951); Camacho v. Bowling, 562 F. Supp. 1012, 1025 (N.D. Ill. 1983); United States v. T.I.M.E.-D.C., Inc., 381 F. Supp. 730, 738-39 (W.D. W.Va. 1974); United States v. Sawyer Transport, Inc., 337 F. Supp. 29 (D. Minn. 1971), aff'd, 463 F.2d 175 (8th Cir. 1972). The acts of a corporation are, after all, simply the acts of all of its employees operating within the scope of their employment. The law on corporate criminal liability reflects this. See, e.g., United States v. Cincotta, 689 F.2d 238, 241, 242 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 991 (1982); United States v. Richmond, 700 F.2d 1183, 1195 n.7 (11th Cir. 1983). Similarly, the knowledge obtained by corporate employees acting within the scope of their employment is imputed to the corporation. Steere Tank Lines, Inc. v. United States, 330 F.2d 719, 722 (5th Cir. 1964). Corporations compartmentalize knowledge, subdividing the elements of specific duties and operations into smaller components. The aggregate of those components constitutes the corporation's knowledge of a particular operation. It is irrelevant whether employees administering one component of an operation know the specific activities of employees administering another aspect of the operation:

> [A] corporation cannot plead innocence by asserting that the information obtained by several employees was not acquired by any one individual who then would have comprehended its full import. Rather the corporation is considered to have acquired the collective knowledge of its employees and is held responsible for their failure to act accordingly.

United States v. T.I.M.E.-D.C., Inc., 381 F. Supp. at 738. Since the Bank had the compartmentalized structure common to all large corporations, the court's collective knowledge instruction was not only proper but necessary.

Nor do we find any defects in the trial court's instructions on specific intent. The court told the jury that the concept of willfulness entails a voluntary, intentional, and bad purpose to disobey the law. Her instructions on this element, when viewed as a whole, directed the jury not to convict for accidental, mistaken or inadvertent acts or omissions. It is urged that the court erroneously charged that willfulness could be found via flagrant indifference by the Bank toward its reporting obligations. With respect to federal regulatory statutes, the Supreme Court has endorsed defining willfulness, in both civil and criminal contexts, as "a disregard for the governing statute and an indifference to its requirements." Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Thurston, 469 U.S. 111, 127 & n.20 (1985); United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., 303 U.S. 239 (1938); accord Stein Distributing Company v. Dept. of Treasury Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 779 F.2d 1407, 1413 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 1963 (1986); United States v. Dye Construction, 510 F.2d 78, 82 (10th Cir. 1975); F.X. Messina Construction Corp. v. Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission, 505 F.2d 701, 702 (1st Cir. 1974); United States v. Tarver, 642 F. Supp. 1109 (D. Wyo. 1986); United States v. T.I.M.E.-D.C., Inc., 381 F. Supp. at 740-41. Accordingly, we find no error in the court's instructions on willfulness.

B. Evidence of Willfulness

The Bank asserts that the evidence did not suffice to show that it had willfully failed to comply with the Act's reporting requirements. We review the evidence in the light most favorable to the government. United States v. Medina, 761 F.2d 12, 16 n.3 (1st Cir. 1985); United States v. Tierney, 760 F.2d 382, 384 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 131 (1985).

As already discussed, the language of the Treasury regulations itself gave notice that cash withdrawals over $10,000 were reportable, regardless of the number of checks used. Primary responsibility for CTR compliance in the Bank's branch offices was assigned to head tellers and branch managers. Head tellers Orlandella and Murphy, who knew of the nature of McDonough's transactions, also knew of the CTR filing obligations imposed by the Bank. The jury heard testimony from former bank teller Simona Wong, who stated that she knew McDonough's transactions were reportable, and that the source of her knowledge was head teller Murphy.

Even if some Bank personnel mistakenly regarded McDonough as engaging in multiple transactions, there was convincing evidence that the Bank knew that his withdrawals were reportable. An internal memo sent in May 1983 by project coordinator Jayne Brady to all branch managers and head tellers stated that "'[r]eportable transactions are expanded to include multiple transactions which aggregate more than $10,000 in any one day.' This includes deposits or withdrawals by a customer to or from more than one account." (Emphasis in original.) The Prudential Branch Manual instructed that if Bank personnel know that a customer has engaged in multiple transactions totalling $10,000 or more, then such transactions should be regarded as a single transaction. In addition, since 1980, the instructions on the back of CTR forms have directed that reports be filed on multiple transactions which aggregate to over $10,000. Finally, a Bank auditor discussed with Orlandella and Murphy, the Bank's obligation to report a customer's multiple transactions in a single day which amount to more than $10,000. We do not suggest that these evidentiary items in themselves legally bound the Bank to report McDonough's transactions; it is the language of the regulations that impose such a duty. This evidence, however, proved that the bank had ample knowledge that transactions like McDonough's came within the purview of the Act.

Regarding the Bank's specific intent to violate the reporting obligation, Simona Wong testified that head teller Patricia Murphy knew that McDonough's transactions were reportable but, on one occasion, deliberately chose not to file a CTR on him because he was "a good customer." In addition, the jury heard testimony that bank employees regarded McDonough's transactions as unusual, speculated that he was a bookie, and suspected that he was structuring his transactions to avoid the Act's reporting requirements. An internal Bank memo, written after an investigation of the McDonough transactions, concluded that a "person managing the branch would have to have known that something strange was going on." Given the suspicions aroused by McDonough's banking practices and the abundance of information indicating that his transactions were reportable, the jury could have concluded that the failure by Bank personnel to, at least, inquire about the reportability of McDonough's transactions constituted flagrant indifference to the obligations imposed by the Act.

We hold that the evidence was sufficient for a finding of willfulness.

C. Instructions Pertaining to the Bank's Post-July 1984 Conduct

At trial, the government introduced evidence of the Bank's CTR compliance efforts after July 31, 1984, the last date on which the Bank was charged with failing to file a CTR. On August 7, 1984, the Bank learned that McDonough's transactions were being investigated by law-enforcement agencies. In addition, the branch manager and head teller were told specifically that McDonough's transactions were reportable. The government introduced evidence of the Bank's conduct after July 1984, which could be found to show scant effort by the Bank to comply with its legal obligations, even after it had learned that McDonough had come under suspicion. The Bank's failure to file a CTR on McDonough's July 31, 1984, transaction was highlighted specifically. The government argued that when the Bank was told directly by law enforcement officers on August 7 that McDonough's transactions were reportable, it should have at least completed a CTR on the July 31 withdrawal, while it still had time to meet the statute's fifteen-day filing deadline. The government also pointed to the fact that between August 1984 and May 1985 there occurred a flurry of law-enforcement activity surrounding McDonough's transactions with the Bank. The Bank, however, did not make any effort to report McDonough's 1983 and 1984 transactions until May 1985, after it recevied a federal grand jury subpoena.

This evidence was admitted originally on the Count One conspiracy charge which the trial court dismissed after all testimony had been taken. The Bank did not move to strike this evidence once the conspiracy charge was dismissed. During closing argument, the government urged that the post-July 1984 evidence manifested the Bank's disregard of its reporting duty, and thus inferentially illuminated its mental state during the time period charged in the indictment. The trial court instructed the jury that it could consider post-July 1984 conduct as probative of the Bank's intent to violate the Act. Specifically, the court told the jury that the evidence might shed light on whether the Bank had been flagrantly indifferent to its reporting obligations.

The Bank made a timely objection to this instruction. It argued that the Act's statutory and regulatory language prohibited a finding of willfulness based on evidence beyond the fifteen-day deadline for filing CTRs on reportable transactions. The Bank also avers that the judge's instructions invited the jury to convict it for acts not charged as violations in the indictment.

A common sense reading of the statute and its regulations suggests that the fifteen-day filing deadline simply marks the commencement of the offense. Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b)[7] has been held to allow the admission of acts or conduct subsequent to the offense charged to prove intent to commit

---

[7] Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) provides:

> (b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

the alleged illegal act.[8] United States v. Whalely, 786 F.2d 1229, 1232-33 (4th Cir. 1986); United States v. Hurley, 755 F.2d 788, 790 (11th Cir. 1985); United States v. Arroyo-Angulo, 580 F.2d 1137, 1149 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 913 (1978); United States v. Gallo, 543 F.2d 361, 364-65 (D.C. Cir. 1976). In prosecutions for willful failure to file tax returns, for example, the element of willfulness may be shown by conduct subsequent to the date on which the return was due. United States v. Sempos, 772 F.2d 1, 2 (1st Cir. 1985); United States v. Richards, 723 F.2d 646, 648-49 (8th Cir. 1983); United States v. Serlin, 707 F.2d 953, 959 (7th Cir. 1983). We note also that the Bank's defense at trial included claims that the nonreporting of these transactions occurred accidentally or by mistake. Rule 404(b) invites the admission of relevant instances of subsequent conduct to show "absence of mistake or accident." Because the Bank did not move to strike the evidence after Count One was dismissed, and since Rule 404(b) allows the admission of subsequent conduct to show a defendant's mental state at the time of the charged offense, we uphold the district court's instruction that post-July 1984 conduct was probative of the Bank's mental state.[9] [8] United States v. Bourque, 541 F.2d 290 (1st Cir. 1976), relied on by the Bank, does not hold to the contrary. In Bourque, the issue was whether subsequent conduct by the defendant could be used to establish the actus reus — the failure to file a tax return on a proscribed date. In the instant case, the criminal act — the defendant's failure to file CTRs — is established. The issue is whether the Bank possessed the requisite mental state. Nothing in Bourque suggests that the prosecution is barred from using subsequent conduct to shed light on the defendant's mens rea at the time of the commission of the criminal act.

---

[9] We reject the suggestion by amicus, the Massachusetts Bankers Association, that our endorsement of the trial court's instruction makes a continuing offense out of a failure to file a CTR within fifteen days of handling a reportable transaction. The act constituting the offense is established after fifteen days. Conduct beyond the fifteen-day filing period is not relevant to whether the offensive act was committed, but only to the mental state with which the act was committed.

We also reject the Bank's contention that the trial judge's reference to the post-July 1984 evidence in her instructions regarding willfulness invited the jury to convict for conduct not charged in the indictment. Viewing the instructions as a whole, we do not think that this reference prejudiced the Bank in any significant way. The trial judge instructed the jury that it should only consider the charges specified in the indictment. She stressed that the offenses charged were thirty-one failures to file CTRs within fifteen days of handling a reportable transaction. She stated that such failures must be willful. The trial judge mentioned the post-July 1984 evidence only once, specifying that the jury should consider this evidence in connection with the element of willfulness.

In United States v. Baskes, 649 F.2d 471 (7th Cir. 1980); cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1000 (1981), the defendant objected to the trial judge's instruction to the jury that subsequent act evidence could be considered to shed light on the defendant's intent to commit the charged offense. The defendant urged that "additional illegalities could be inferred from the [subsequent act] evidence and . . . might confuse the issue and mislead the jury." Id. at 480. The Seventh Circuit upheld the charge, noting that the trial judge instructed the jury that it could only consider the evidence as it related to the defendant's intent. Id. at 481. It would have been preferable if the trial judge here had directly and specifically informed the jury that the post-July 1984 evidence could be considered only on the issue of the Bank's state of mind before July 1984. It is significant, however, that this evidence was mentioned only once, in direct connection with the instructions on the element of specific intent. The trial judge had already carefully instructed the jury to disregard the conspiracy charge against the defendants, which involved alleged criminal conduct by the Bank after July 1984. Moreover, the jury was given a redacted copy of the indictment which lacked any reference to conduct engaged in by the Bank after July 1984, and instructed only to consider the charges, "outlined by date," specified therein. Viewed as a whole, the instructions provided sufficient guidance to the jury that the post-July 1984 evidence was relevant only to the intent with which the Bank committed the offenses charged in redacted indictment.

Affirmed.

Appendix B.

United States Court of Appeals

For the First Circuit

No. 86-1334

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Appellee,
v.
BANK OF NEW ENGLAND, N.A.,
Defendant, Appellant.

JUDGMENT

Entered: June 10, 1987

This cause came on to be heard on appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, and was argued by counsel.

Upon consideration whereof, It is now here ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows: The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

By the Court:

FRANCIS P. SCIGLIANO

Clerk

[cc: Mr. Tribe and Ms. Criscitelli]

APPENDIX C

United States Court of Appeals

For the First Circuit

No. 86-1334

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Appellee,
v.
BANK OF NEW ENGLAND, N.A.,
Defendant, Appellant.

Before
Campbell, Chief Judge,
Coffin, Bownes, Breyer, Torruella, and Selya, Circuit Judges,
and Pettine,* Senior District Judge.

ORDER OF COURT
Entered: July 6, 1987

The panel of judges that rendered the decision in this case has voted to deny the petition for rehearing.

The judges of the Court in regular active service have carefully considered the suggestion for rehearing en banc, and a majority of said judges has not ordered that the appeal be reheard en banc,

It is ordered that the petition for rehearing and suggestion for rehearing en banc be, and the same hereby is, denied.

By the Court:

FRANCIS P. SCIGLIANO, CLERK

By: Richard W. Gordon
Chief Deputy Clerk

*Of the District of Rhode Island, sitting by designation.

[cc: Mr. Tribe and Ms. Criscitelli]

APPENDIX D

Excerpts from Trial Transcript of February 14, 1986

[Instructions to the Jury on "Willfulness"]

* * * * *

And, finally, the most important element really, the one on which most of the time was spent, is that the Government has to prove that the defendant willfully participated in the failure to file a report. Although the obligation to file currency transaction reports is absolute, that is, a reportable transaction has to be reported, a defendant is not criminally liable for failing to report unless the defendant knowingly and willfully participated in the failure to file the report or knowingly and willfully failed to file a report.

Knowingly simply means voluntarily and intentionally. It's designed to exclude a failure that is done by mistake or accident, or for some other innocent [19] reason. Willfully means voluntarily, intentionally, and with a specific intent to disregard, to disobey the law, with a bad purpose to violate the law.

Now, both knowledge and intent refer to a person's state of mind. You cannot hear it; you can't see it; you can't smell it. You can only infer it, and you can only infer it from the person's actions and statements and the circumstances in which the person acted and spoke. So, what you will have to do with respect to Ms. Murphy and Ms. Orlandella is to look at what they said and what they did.

And let me go gack a moment, lest I confuse you. You must look separately at each defendant; you look separately at what Ms. Murphy did and said, in order to determine what her state of mind was; and you must look separately at Ms.

Orlandella and what she said and did; and, subsequently, also, Mr. McDonough to determine what his state of mind was. And do it only on the basis of the actions and statements of each of the defenants and on the basis of the circumstances surrounding their actions and statements. So, you cannot, you cannot decide that a defendant knew something based on what somebody else said. You may certainly consider what somebody else said as part of the circumstances and part of the entire picture within which the defendant acted, but what you are trying to find out is what did the defendant know, what did the defendant think, and what the [20] defendant's intent.

Let me try to give you an example.

Consider, for example, a very small child who's trying to build a tower of blocks and when she gets to the third block, puts it on lopsided and the whole tower comes down. The child tries several times and the tower keeps falling down, and then suddenly the child starts screaming and throwing blocks. You don't know what is in the child's mind from what the child says, but you can infer from the fact that the child had been trying and the child was unsuccessful and threw the blocks that she was angry or frustrated, or in some other way displeased.

So, here, you will have to look at all of the circumstances that surrounded the activities of Ms. Murphy and Ms. Orlandella and look at their statements and look at their conduct and determine from them whether the Government has proven that they knew about the regulation and that they willfully, that is, with an intent to disobey the law, violated it, failed to file the reports.

Now, both of the defendants say that they did not know that the law required the reporting of multiple check transactions, and, indeed, that others at the bank didn't know it either. The element of knowledge may, however, be inferred from evidence that a defendant deliberately closed her eyes with a conscious purpose to avoid learning about the [21] requirements which would otherwise have been obvious to her. In other words, you may, but you do not have to, infer knowledge from a defendant's willful blindness to the requirement. You cannot infer knowledge simply because a person may have been negligent or may have been stupid, or may have made a mistake. But if you find beyond a reasonable doubt that either Ms. Murphy or Ms. Orlandella was aware to a high degree of probability that reports were required under the circumstances of this case, then you may infer that she acted with knowledge.

Ms. Murphy and Ms. Orlandella have introduced evidence tending to establish their good reputations for honesty and integrity as head tellers at the bank. You may consider this with all the other evidence in determining their guilt or innocence. Such evidence, taken with all the other evidence you have heard, may create a reasonable doubt as to their guilt, and you may consider it in that context.

Let me summarize. If you find that the Government has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the bank was involved in a currency transaction exceeding $10,000 on or about the day charged, that no report was filed, and that the defendant you're then considering knowingly and willfully participated in the failure to file the report, then you must find that defendant guilty of that charge. If you find that the Government has not proven each of the three elements as [22] to any defendant or as to any count, then you must find the defendant not guilty on that count.

Let me turn to the bank. The elements with respect to the counts against the bank are substantially the same as those I've just outlined to you, with one addition. The first element is again that the bank at about the time alleged was involved in a currency transaction of more than $10,000. The second element is again that no report was filed within the time required. The third element is again that the bank willfully failed to file and that Mr. McDonough willfully participated in the failure to file a report.

The fourth element is new: That the failure to file the report as to a particular transaction was part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period; that the failure to file the report as to —

(Whereupon, Juror No. 6 requested the instructions be repeated.)

THE COURT: Where do you want me to start?

JUROR NO. 6: The illegal activity, the fourth.

THE COURT: Okay. The first two elements are exactly the same: that there was a currency transaction, the bank was involved in a currency transaction of more than $10,000; that no report was filed is two; three, that the bank willfully failed to file a report or that Mr. McDonough [23] willfully participated in the failure to file a report; four, that's the new one, four, that the failure to file a report as to a particular transaction was part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period.

I will say nothing more on one and two, because we covered those extensively, and the considerations here are identical to what I have already told you. With respect to three, the requirement of willful action, with respect to Mr. McDonough, you have to judge whether he acted knowingly and willfully by the same process that you used to judge whether Ms. Murphy and Ms. Orlandella acted willfully; that is, you have to discern his state of mind: Did he use multiple checks with the knowledge that the transaction had to be reported and with the intent that the bank, nevertheless, omit reporting it; that is, did he willfully participate in any willful failure by the bank to report.

The Government has to prove that Mr. McDonough intended to violate the law by what he did. It is not enough for the Government to show that he intended to avoid the law if he honestly thought that if he used checks of less than $10,000, no reports needed to be filed. That is, taking advantage of what a person honestly thinks is a loophole in the law is not a willful violation of the law, even if the person is wrong about the loophole. Also, Mr. McDonough [24] can't be found guilty of willfully participating in an offense if you find that the bank was not guilty. He can't willfully be guilty of participating in something that turns out not to be a crime. So, if you find the bank not guilty as to any count, then Mr. McDonough cannot be found guilty of that count. He can be guilty only if the principal, the bank in this case, is found guilty with respect to any particular count in which he's also charged.

The bank is in a different position. It is a corporation. And it acts through its officers, employees, and agents. The bank is responsible for the acts of each employee, but it is also responsible for its conduct as an institution. So, to determine whether the bank acted knowingly and willfully, you have to look, first, at the state of mind of the bank's officers, employees, and agents, who are acting within the scope of their employment. As I think Mr. Markham or one the lawyers pointed out, that's an important concept: An employee acts within the scope of his employment if he performs duties he is generally assigned to perform, and he intends, thereby, to benefit the corporation. It doesn't matter whether the corporation is in fact benefitted, so long as he intends that the corporation be benefitted.

Now, let me talk about the concept of knowledge in the context of the bank. In deciding what the bank knew of [25] C.T.R. filing requirements, look first at the conduct and statements of each employee, regardless of his or her level of responsibility, and decide whether when acting within the scope of his or her employment the employee knew of the requirement in the context of multiple checks. You can look at all of the employees of the bank. And if any employee knew that multiple checks would require the filing of reports, the bank knew it, provided the employee knew it within the scope of his employment, as I have defined it to you.

In addition, however, you have to look at the bank as an institution. As such, its knowledge is the sum of the knowledge of all of the employees. That is, the bank's knowledge is the totality of what all of the employees know within the scope of their employment. So, if Employee A knows one facet of the currency reporting requirement, B knows another facet of it, and C a third facet of it, the bank knows them all. So, if you find that an employee within the scope of his employment knew that C.T.R.s had to be filed, even if multiple checks are used, the bank is deemed to know it. The bank is also deemed to know it if each of several employees knew a part of that requirement and the sum of what the separate employees knew amounted to knowledge that such a requirement existed.

There is a similar double business with respect to [26] the concept of willfulness with respect to the bank. In deciding whether the bank acted willfully, again you have to look first at the conduct of all employees and officers, and, second, at what the bank did nor did not do as an institution. The bank is deemed to have acted willfully if one of its employees in the scope of his employment acted willfully. So, if you find that an employee willfully failed to do what was necessary to file these reports, then that is deemed to be the act of the bank, and the bank is deemed to have willfully failed to file.

In this connection, again review the conduct of the various employees who had responsibility for C.T.R. filing and determine in the same manner as you did with respect to Ms. Murphy, Ms. Orlandella, and Mr. McDonough what their state of mind was, what they intended, and then make the judgment as to whether anybody willfully failed to file any of these reports that are at issue in this case.

Alternatively, the bank as an institution has certain responsibilities; as an organization, it has certain responsibilities. And you will have to determine whether the bank as an organization consciously avoided learning about and observing C.T.R. requirements. The Government to prove the bank guilty on this theory, has to show that its failure to file was the result of some flagrant organizational indifference. In this connection, you should look at the [27] evidence as to bank's effort, if any, to inform its employees of the law; its effort to check on their compliance; it's response to various bits of information that it got in August and September of '84 and February of '85; its policies, and how it carried out its stated policies.

You should consider separately the evidence as to each of the transactions that is charged in the indictment and consider separately whether the Government has proven a willful failure by the bank to file reports with respect to each transaction and, also, then, of course, with respect to Mr. McDonough, whether the Government has proven his willful participation in each of these.

If you find that the Government has proven with respect to any transaction either that an employee within the scope of his employment willfully failed to file a required report or that the bank was flagrantly indifferent to its obligations, then you may find that the bank has willfully failed to file the required reports.

* * * * *

[30] If you have any questions about anything I've told you in the course of your deliberations, please write them out and let the marshal know, I will then try to answer them, either by bringing you down here and reexplaining something [31] or by sending you a note, always with the consent of counsel.

Mr. Harris?

JUROR NO. 3: I have one question right now, in terms of the bank, the third item, I'm not quite clear as to whether it has to be the bank willfully and Mr. McDonough participating in order for —

THE COURT: With respect to the bank, if you find that the bank acted willfully, either because you find that an employee knew of the requirement and willfully failed to file a report or because you find that the bank as an institution was plainly indifferent to its obligations, then you may find the bank guilty. It has nothing to do with Mr. McDonough. Mr. McDonough was only the one who happened to bring in the multiple checks. But in judging Mr. McDonough, you have to look at what he did.

Does that make it clear?

JUROR NO. 3: Right. It's not both of those things, and Mr. McDonough doesn't have to enter into it in terms of the bank being guilty.

THE COURT: No, no.

* * * * *

APPENDIX E

Excerpts from Trial Transcript of February 14, 1986

[Instructions to the Jury on "Pattern"]

* * * * *

Now, let me just briefly talk about the last element, that having to do with the pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000. Pattern simply means repeated transactions. One transaction is not a pattern; two may not be either, but if you get a series of transactions, that may then be a pattern. And in this context, what we're talking about is a pattern of [28] repeated failures to file required reports on these transactions.

The Government must prove that the transactions involved more than $100,000 in a 12-month period. No one transaction has to be greater than $100,000, so long as the total of the transactions is in any 12-month period. It's a shifting period, so you can look at any period that you want. And if within that period, transactions of more than $100,000 occurred and there was a willful failure to file with respect to them, then this fourth element has been satisfied.

So, if you find that a series of transactions occurred that required the filing of reports and that the total of such transactions in any 12-month period involved more than $100,000, this element is satisfied, even if no one transaction itself exceeded 100,000 dollars. It is kind of a fillip on the multiple business. So, if you find that a reportable transaction occurred, that no report was filed, that transaction may be considered as part of the pattern if others occurred and if in any 12-month period the total was more than $100,000.

Again, in summary, if you find, one, that the government has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the bank was at the time alleged involved in a currency transaction; two, that no report was filed; three, that the bank acted [29] willfully, and Mr. McDonough participated willfully; and that the transaction was part of a pattern involving transactions of more than $100,000, then you must find the defendant guilty of that particularly count.

* * * * *